In most jurisdictions, certain laboratory employees such as laboratory technicians or other technical laboratory employees may obtain specimens for blood irradiation studies without the consent of the donor. This is because there is no evidence that they have any risk of transmission of significant quantities of human pathogens. This article discusses various aspects of the legal, ethical, and social issues surrounding nonmedical laboratory personnel obtaining human blood specimens for blood irradiation studies. The discussion is confined to specimens obtained by venipuncture. Special rules may apply to specimens obtained by other means.
