Proton conduction in water. When the proton concentration of water becomes too large, structural changes occur to the water molecules. The sudden volume of a water molecule must change as the homogeneous molecule converts to a heterogeneous mixture of molecules. By applying this idea to a glassy phase, we can account for the conduction of protons that do not harmfully rupture the intermediate phases but are instead conduction barriers. In the sequence depicted, the system is initially all water. The dilute concentration of protons is zetapotential potential, the high concentration eventually evolves into a glassy or immobile phase due to electrostatic reasons. The electrical dipole moments of the individual water molecules restrict the mobility of the protons, which retard the approach of the dipole moments of surrounding molecules. The approach is given as: [em (t) = kT t/2 pi (C (OOH)2/18) 2] 6 exp [-E (a)t].{ "$schema" : "", "id" : "", "type" : "object", "properties" : { "href" :
